Slower, more expensive mail in store for the US

Tonda Rush, National Newspaper Association (NNA), July 21, 2021

The Postal Service is good to go on its plan to slow down the mail and implement aggressive price increases, according to the Postal Regulatory Commission in a pair of decisions handed down this week.

The PRC expressed skepticism about the wisdom of adding an additional day to service standards for both First-Class and Periodicals mail.

But it stopped short of telling USPS not to make the change. Instead, it cautioned USPS to examine its assumptions about cost savings and to look into the root causes of mail slowdowns in recent months.

On a planned increase in postage cost for Periodicals that will average nearly 9%, added to a 1.5% increase earlier this year, the Commission gave USPS a green light and denied pleas by industry groups to hold off on the increase until the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit has ruled on the legality of the large price hikes.

However, the Commission did criticize the Postal Service's treatment of the costs for flat trays as a substitute for mail sacks, urging better cost analysis, as NNA has repeatedly requested.

The Commission has ruled in the past that USPS needs more money, citing trends that have driven mail handling. delivery and transportation costs to accelerate faster than inflation.

"There is little to cheer about in this set of decisions," National Newspaper Association Chair Brett Wesner, president of Wesner Publications, Cordell, Oklahoma, said. "Slower, more costly mail is assuredly going to accelerate the downward spiral > of the Postal Service. The whole nation will suffer, particularly the rural areas served by many community newspapers. NNA has warned for a decade that without action by Congress, this decline could become almost impossible to stop. We reiterate that call now to our Members of Congress.

"NNA supported the addition of one day to delivery times for long-distance newspaper mail, on the condition that USPS keep its commitment to reach its target 95% of the time. We are already working with USPS on a task force to improve this delivery so our newspapers can stem the flow of lost subscribers. We hope the Commission will be aggressive in enforcing the new standards. The rising rates, however, are not the bitter medicine coming from years of strange technological and environmental disruptions to the mail, as the Commission seems to believe. They are the hemlock that will eventually kill universal service and require Congress to bail out its agency."

Survey predicts earlier holiday shopping season; Black Friday

'outdated'

Marianne Wilson, 7/13/21, Chain Store Age Shoppers are poised to get a jump start on holiday shopping this year.

Thirty-four percent of consumers intend to start holiday shopping by Labor Day, according to a survey by digital experience management software company Sitecore, and 53% of marketers have planned campaigns to start earlier this year than last. Fifty-three percent also added more domestic or local suppliers to mitigate supply chain challenges.

The survey also found that only 60% of brands plan a Black Friday promotion, down 17% from last year. Eighty-five percent of marketers are using the pandemic to "reset" Black Friday sales practices — 80% feel that Black Friday has become outdated and associated negatively with consumer culture. Nearly all (76%) will limit Black Friday promotions to the lone weekend on the calendar, out of fear of devaluing their brand and reducing consumer spend all year long.

Of marketers with a brick-and-mortar presence, 60% plan to make it making it an experiential destination this year. Forty-nine percent 49% feel the 2021 holiday season is the last chance to prove the value of their store.

11 tips to grow your agriculture coverage

By Bart Pfankuch, South Dakota Newswatch, June 29, 2021

Depending on where you live and work as a journalist, the

Depending on where you live and work as a journalist, there are two basic levels of importance when it comes to coverage of the agriculture industry: "very important" or "extremely important."

How and where food is grown or raised, how it is processed and transported, what it costs to buy and how the industry affects the economy and the environment are important to readers, advertisers, agricultural producers and policymakers.

And yet, mostly due to cutbacks, agricultural coverage has been reduced or even eliminated by many traditional media outlets.

Specialty agricultural publications still do yeoman's work in covering the industry, but their reach beyond the industry core is limited and the news is often presented from the perspective of an industry insider.

Every journalist has the opportunity, and some might say the imperative, to cover agriculture and the vast range of news topics associated with it. Here are some tips to start or expand your coverage of agriculture.

- Start small, then go in-depth. Take on a weather story or farmer profile to break in, then go deeper as your skills and confidence build. Do not be intimidated; most farmers want to share stories about their lives and work.
- Read widely to get story ideas. This is true on all beats, but keeping your eyes and mind open to ideas is especially important with a complex industry such as agriculture. Subscribe or go online to scan specialty publications focused on agriculture, then go deeper into topics that may be old hat to industry reporters. Read national stories about the industry and localize them. Talk to government officials who oversee the industry and read reports they or industry groups produce about concerns or issues facing the industry. Visit websites of industry or lobbying organizations.
- Sign up for online bulletins sent regularly by government regulators, industry groups, the National Weather Service, university extension offices or consumer groups. Then read the bulletins and mine for ideas.
- Drive around the countryside with the radio off. Look more closely at farms, ranches and the people who run them. What is new or unusual or special? Seek out industry trends, historical patterns or colorful feature stories worthy of reporting efforts.

- Consider how agriculture affects your own life. Wear your story-idea hat while grocery shopping, while visiting the farmers' market or while considering the weather and its recent or long-range patterns.
- Once an idea emerges, interview government officials or industry groups for the big-picture outlook, and then ask for names and phone numbers of producers who might be willing to be interviewed by phone or in person. Be aware that some producers may be de facto industry spokespeople, so try also to find local producers on your own. Scouring social media platforms or specialty publication websites can help you find fresh producers to interview.
- Take a two-pronged approach to reporting. First, speak to a variety of sources (especially front-line producers) on the phone. Then, set up a site visit or farm tour to meet producers where they work and live to create opportunities for a deeper understanding of issues, to get great photos, audio or video, and to create opportunities for colorful, detailed writing.
- Think deeply, ask many questions and never assume. Modern agriculture is complicated and hightech. Be patient and diligent in trying to understand the terminology or concepts involved. Confirm your understanding of a topic with sources so you can present information or processes clearly and accurately to readers.
- Ask tough questions, play devil's advocate at times and get the other side. Not every agricultural story needs a quote from PETA, but it is important to seek out reasonable sources who question agricultural procedures or ecological impacts. Often, those sources are not antiagriculture, but mostly want the industry to operate more efficiently and in concert with the earth.
- Prepare well for farm visits. Get clear directions, map your route and show up on time; do not arrive in your Sunday best; be ready for sun, rain or snow; have water or soda; bring a rag or napkins for messes; take written notes while also tape-recording interviews; ask permission before getting close to crops, equipment or livestock; be wary and respectful of animals; take candid photos of farmers in action but get a staged portrait just in case; never be in a hurry.
- Enjoy the writing process. As an agricultural reporter, you have the rare opportunity to bring readers into a world they may never see. Embrace that gift by writing clearly and accurately but with authority, flair and color.
